The legacy of the Games: The leadership challenges

A range of programmes and projects are now being developed with young people in mind, designed to preserve what is to be gained from the 2012 Olympic and Paralympic Games. Education is viewed as a key tool in ensuring we inherit a lasting legacy from the Games, capable of sustaining the longer-term impact. Young people were a crucial element in London winning the bid from the start and their contribution to securing long term impact is vital.

Business, education and community leaders need to be at the very heart of these plans to inspire young people to develop the citizenship, employability and leadership skills required for individual and business achievement. Moreover, the Games can be used as a vehicle for ensuring those who have not thrived in mainstream education can achieve their full potential: they can also act as a catalyst for increasing the range and breadth of these crucial skills in all young people.

What can we, as employers, do to encourage and support education and community leaders to make this happen?

This discussion will offer Strategic Forum employers and their education, community and government guests the ideal opportunity to discuss and debate these challenges.
